Questions and Answers

What are your weaknesses?

Answering this question is like being torn between the devil and the deep blue sea. For a management consulting applicant, revealing the truth might cause rejection but lying isn't a good idea, either. To answer the question, try to rephrase it. Ask yourself, "What are my points for improvement?" This elicits a positive response, a turn-on for recruiters.

You can start describing your weakness but never leave it as it is. Add details on how you are resolving it. Emphasize that you've already started working on it. For instance, if you're a management consulting applicant who's not excellent in preparing presentations, you can say that you're currently taking a crash course or you're learning the application with a friend. You can mention that you've realized it's not that complicated after all.

Never state a weakness that opposes any of the main requirements of the job. For instance, if you hate numbers, don't make the mortal sin of mentioning this. You will instantly get rejected since consultants are bombarded with numbers for research and analysis.

"Build up your weaknesses until they become your strong points."
